American University

It would seem to me that the sending/home institution (ie in your case, Catholic) maintains the matriculation of its students studying abroad and therefore all the students' financial aid continues to be processed by the home institution. So all that would be irrelevant to any inter-institutional agreement -- unless Catholic doesn't maintain its study abroad students and doesn't process their FA in which case the foreign university would need to do it if they were a Title IV institution?

If your attorneys still insist something has to be in there, then surely you can come up with a paragraph that states Catholic will continue to process its students FA when they study abroad, as per the requirements of being a Title IV institution under US law.

Embassy of Australia

The Foreign Schools team at the DOE has a list of all the foreign schools that participate in Title IV. I have a copy of the list but it's a few years out of date. You can also use the FAFSA school lookup to check international partners' eligibility. I just looked up Australian Catholic University who is currently eligible:

If you need a contact in the Foreign Schools team, try Marcia Fediw at Marcia.fediw@ed.gov.

University of Albany

The peps data base has off-campus locations for title iv purposes. that might be a place to start <http://www2.ed.gov/offices/OSFAP/PEPS/index.html>

St. Cloud State University

Since the Title IV is only about properties the University leases and is in control of, our partners are not subject to this. This should not be added to the agreement template unless your university is in control of the property on your partner institution's campus.
